Ex Ggy. Wise .- The speech of this gentleman in the Chahoon case, is exciting much attention. One report of it [an extract] is to this effect:

He claimed that he undertook the case in the discharge of his professional duty, and that he would hold his ground in contempt of the clamor raised against him. He was like the man he most admired-Andrew Jackson-in at least one respect, that when he took a stand, by the eternal God, he would die by it, if necessary. It was charged that he sought to curry favor with the powers that be, but he avowed himself a naked, unrepentant and unforesworn rebel, who would perjure his soul for no price, and who would not accept even his dearest rights as favors or upon conditions. He had never asked pardon, and never would do so, for he was not conscious of having done anything wrong. He was not sorry for anything he had done in the war, except that he had failed to do as much as he desired. Nor could he consent for any consideration to wrong the heroic dead who had died by his side for the lost cause. No! He would accept no pardon. He would not with his knowledge and consent allow his name to sneak through congress in an act removing disabilities. He contemned and spurned these things as adding insult to injury. Were Ulysses Grant to send him a special pardon, he would draw black lines around it and return it, endorsed with the declaration that he was no more a traiter than he (Grant) was. Nor would he take advantage of a general amnesty-a thing which the ladies present would pardon him for fitly denominating as a d-n nasty trick to swindle the people of the South into a tacit confession of guilt.

Yesterday he was the owner of slaves; to day he was a slave. He desired to be free, but not upon conditions - not upon terms prescribed by a power that he would never heknowledge. He hoped, as old as he was, for better days and better things, when Virginiaalways a State, has been from the beginning, now is, and ever will be, world without endwould stand erect one; more, not as a creature, but a creator of the Union; not ruled, but ruling; not a suppliant, but a sovereign by divine right, He had had no art nor part in bringing her to her present attitude, with every joint, aye, her present attitude, with every joint, aye, every vertebra bent, crawling through the dirt of humiliation back into the Union that her own hands had built. "Great God, what a spectacle!" said he. "But, gentlemen of the committee of nine, it is your own work. Virginia, 'thou canst not say I did it!"

Here is another extract: - "To take the life of a State is the highest crime that man can commit, for a State is the highest being man can create, and to destroy it is worse than murder and treason combined; and this was done by the usurpation of Congress in Virginia, which, by that usurpation was first made provisional, and now is provincial

She is not now what she once was, nor can you make her like it. The life is gone. She is dismembered, and passing from provisional to provincial. No precedents hold good with her She is not like California a State brought into existence by usurpation, but a Secate orushed to death by usurpation. "My old mother'—no she is not my mother: I do not acknowledge her as such. Sooner would I accept the witch of Endor, who appeared before Saul, as my fair and beauteous mother of the past, than the old hag they are now bringing forward under the auspices of the Committee of Nine and Congress, and trying to palm off upon me as Virginia. Call you whis the Virginia of the past, the god-like Virginia of the revolution, who sprung forth to lead the nation in arms clothed in all the glory of Minerva, new-born and full armed glory of Minerva, new-born and full armed from the brain of Jove? A State deprived of the authority to call even a convention of her people to amend her constitution except ur terms and conditions!" ...er

He stood here not to complain things, but to protest against both of these lican party and the Committee of Nine making a slaughter house of this a slaughter house of this city, and to aid this court in keeping them from fighting with one another for the offices and spoils."

John Washington, ancestor of the first President of ene United States, arrived in America in 1659, a passenger in a ship owned by Ed ward Prescott, of which one John Green was captain. During the voyage, Elizabeth Richardson, who may have been only an enthusias. tic woman, was suspected of witcheraft and hung by the crew.

Washington, incensed by the transaction, upon landing preferred charges against the owner of the vessel, and Fendall, Governor of Maryland, took bonds for his appearance to embracing all qualities of earthenware from answer at the next Provincial Court, held at

St. Mary's. On September 30th, Washington, who lived in Westmoreland, Va., on the opposite side of the Potomac river, wrote to Fendall:

"Hon'ble sir. Yours of this 26th instant this day I received. I am sory, y't my extraordinary occasions will not permitt mee to bee at ye next Provincial Court to be held in Maryland ye 4th of this next month. Because then, God willing. I intend to gett my young Sonne baptised. All ye Company and Gossips being already invited. Besides in this short time witnesses cannot be got to come over. But if Mr. Presscott bee bound to answer it yee next Provincial Court after this I shall doe what lyeth in my power to gett them over.
